

Addressing Unhoused Persons at Airports

As operators, unhoused people at airports pose significant challenges. What can we do?

Collaboration with shelter groups

Discuss potential programs to help affected individuals with various opportunities like employment.

Community engagement

- Engage with local community to address these individuals.
- Job fairs, vocational training, or support programs.
- Local employment services or community organizations for assistance.

What could airports offer?

Facilities and resources

- Designated safe areas, if space permits.
- Access to basic amenities.
- Information kiosks with details about support services.

Awareness campaigns

- Promoting understanding and empathy.
- Training programs for airport staff on interacting with affected people.
- Informational posters.
- Videos or short documentaries showcasing success stories.

We are in this together

Airports can address unhoused people by establishing partnerships with local shelters, engaging with the community, and providing mental health and social services support.

They can offer dedicated spaces, basic amenities, and access to information about local shelters. Raising awareness through training programs, informational materials, and success stories is crucial.

By taking proactive measures, airports can make a positive impact on unhoused individuals and the airport community.
